comisarul, traducere lui Laurențiu Popescu comisarul, traducere de Laurențiu Popescu comisarul. 2.7. The comisar was a ferocious person, harsh and bullying, domineering and contemptuous... And, of course, he was the smartest, the most clever, and the smartest in school, though not very popular. So, with her social position as the daughter of a minister, Regina was in a very different position than the rest of the girls at the school. They weren't as smart or as well-bred as her, and although Regina still had several friends, she had only one close friend, Liana, whose father's job had been important to her. With her marriage, she also lost the social status her father had given her. Regina felt alone in this new position in which she was a woman and a mother. She couldn't find any time to read anything. She was too busy with the children, with her husband, with the domestic chores, as well as with trying to keep her husband from seeing all those other women. This gave her an identity problem, a sort of identity crisis, which she had also felt when she began to study at the university. She couldn't settle on any subject she had enough competence in, or on any career she wanted to follow... We knew Regina very well, and her unhappy situation tormented her all the time. She was proud and sensitive. For her, anything that was associated with motherhood was demeaning and a sort of punishment. She tried several times to get rid of the children, but was always forced to give them up for adoption. She never looked for a job, or tried to find a job, because she felt this job would be shameful, which was why she gave up studying at the university. In addition to this, she had the problem of how to treat the children. She had them, but she didn't have the time or the energy to take care of them. So she took them for walks and bought toys, and the rest was up to the two mothers who had adopted them. Regina's husband, Traian, helped her a little, because she really didn't have any reason to get along with him. They had a very cold relationship, and so they tried to avoid each other as much as possible. Their only form of entertainment was going to the movies. "The Slaves", "A Matter 8215746f
